World Health Organization has recently required the provision of radiological protection measures against the countries which use biological and radiological weapons (B+R). The aim of this study is to evaluate the performance of various radionuclides used in B+R research and development against the provisions of WHO requirements. The various radionuclides are evaluated using the International Commission on Radiological Protection (ICRP) 66, ICRP 67, ICRP 110 and ICRP 114 publications and recommended practices. The biological effects as a result of the release of radionuclides from the weapons are calculated based on the release activity, the dose rate, the dose equivalent per unit activity (d(Ra)), the dose-effect relationship and the minimum detectable effect. The results show that radionuclides with the most stringent dose limits are Br-36, I-131, Pu-239, Cs-137, Tc-99m and I-123. The ICRP 110 and 114 publications are very short and provide only a limited dose limits for some radionuclides which are based on the radiological protection regulations in the USA and Canada. The present results provide the minimum dose limits for various radionuclides according to the recommendations of WHO and will be very useful for B+R research and development. This invention is directed to a means for correcting the defect in the sight of the animal eye of patients who are afflicted with cataracts, and, more particularly, to an implant that can be inserted into the affected eye to relieve the clouding over of the cataractous lens and restore the patient's visual acuity.
